Enjoy the game! The invention relates to a device and a process for drying a continuous fibrous web or fleece. The invention is based on a previously known device and process for drying a web from a producing machine which is disposed downstream of a web-forming machine, for example, a producing machine for producing a paper web or a sheet material web. In the drying device, the web is guided over a heated drying surface as it moves to the end of a drying gap, as disclosed, for example, in U.S. Pat. No. 3,712,302. The web is dried by the impingement of heated air and/or suction onto the web. This hot air is carried from the heated drying surface by a heated gas flow introduced over the drying surface. This gas flow is introduced by blowers or other devices from at least one inlet to the drying gap. The source of the heated gas flow may be, for example, an air heater and/or a gas heater. In these known devices, the heated air is introduced into the drying gap only with difficulty and can be blown only inadequately onto the web. Accordingly, a strong negative pressure prevails in the drying gap. In order to avoid this negative pressure, the amount of air introduced must be correspondingly increased, which results in a more time-consuming drying process. With this known process, it is also difficult to achieve a certain desired effect of the heated air and the suction, for example, to impart a certain strength to the web or to control the thickness of the web or fleece or to provide the desired porosity. It is an object of the invention to remove these disadvantages and to provide a device for drying a continuous fibrous web or fleece in which the drying conditions, particularly the effect of the heated air, can be more precisely adjusted. It is a further object to provide a device which is

>1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a process for coating structures, in particular micromechanical optical and/or opto-electronic components in such a way that contaminating ions present in the drift gas of an ion beam and/or in a reactive gas to be used in the coating are destroyed and at least a part of the positive charge is neutralized, as well as a control circuit and a corresponding coil of the ion beam source for realizing it. 2.

Description of the Related Art In the manufacture of micro-electronic components, generally photolithographic processes are used in order to simplify the fabrication of micro-structures, on which subsequent structure-forming processes, for example etching or anisotropic and/or isotropic reactive deposition, are then carried out. Certain processes known as selective plating, in particular, for example, of Acheson coatings, are used at present in order to create a functional thin reflective coating for optical components, such as silicon lenses or photonic structures, which comprises a metallic free-floating thin film. In the process, ions of a suitable reactant gas, generally carried by an inert gas, diffuse or are carried into a vapor phase by heating. The intense neutralizing process of the coating material has to be carried out expediently, for example, at temperatures of as low as  $-60^{\circ}$  C. or less. A detailed description, regarding the suitability of this process for use in the manufacture of optical components on the basis of silicon substrates,
