While playing a Fantasy game can be fun, interacting with AI companions would be nice. Each cutscene should ideally be worth more than the previous. The concept of showing how much more dangerous the next area is upfront could be interesting too. I would be highly interested in a turn based online system. I hate not knowing the stats of the enemies with no way of knowing how they will attack the party. I also would love if the party members could be upgraded with more XP. Show lessImage copyright Getty Images Shares of US drone maker AeroVironment on Tuesday soared about 37% after the firm raised $143m (£105m) in a public offering. The company makes drones used for everything from mapping to search and rescue. AeroVironment said it would use the money to pay down debt, buy back shares and further develop its drones. Chief executive Bob Malcolm said on a call with investors that the offering was the largest of a drone company since drones became commercially available. He said the offering of 2.25m shares at $22, and the size of the deal meant it was a record IPO. The company also announced the appointment of Robert Feil, as chief financial officer, and Dave Chard, as chief legal counsel, replacing current executives John Myers and Dan Gutman. Unmanned aerial vehicles AeroVironment's drones are used by the military, for search and rescue, and even for surveillance. They are also used by civilians to monitor natural disasters. The company said it could produce 30,000 drones annually, up from 20,000, if it successfully raises additional funding. Mr Malcolm said AeroVironment planned to use the cash to repay debt and to pay dividends for the company. He said the company was "nearing the point of no return" in terms of accelerating its pace of development. Mr Malcolm said AeroVironment expected to increase its annual revenue to $550m from around $430m by 2016, thanks to industry consolidation and the firm's improved leadership. Mr Malcolm said to date the company had achieved 37% of its revenue and 67% of its annual production targets. 'Joy of flight' Investors are beginning to see the appeal of drones. US drone maker AeroVironment was publicly valued at $2.7bn in its most recent stock offering, in May 2011.
