The Dark Pictures Anthology is a sci-fi anthology collection of six films centered on the idea of speciesism and war. It was released in 1991, and was directed by five different directors: Garth Ennis, Guy Ritchie, Guy Maddin, Jean-Pierre Jeunet, and Walter Salles.

A film can be a "dark" picture if they decide to create something in terms of genre, theme, plot, narrative, or style of storytelling. Whether dark or not, though, is matter of opinion and not to be taken so seriously as to call them "dark pictures". The term "dark" is quite often used when we are just talking about movies that are not really desirable to the viewer. A dark movie is generally a low-budget movie or one we're just not interested in watching (but it is quite usual that some fans of the dark genre honestly enjoy watching movies like the aforementioned, including the directors. Madness, eh?). There is also a difference between "dark" movies and "underground", usually more restrictive in the sense that "dark" movies can make more elements in their stories and storytelling, whereas "underground" movies are made with artistic intentions but it becomes more restricted in its storytelling and does not involve elements which are glorifying or abandoning the great story. Thus, if a movie claims to be "dark" or "uncommon", we usually assume that the movie is "uglified", "challenging", or "genuine". "Dark" movies are also not necessarily "weird" or "out of the ordinary" in a sense of things, and they can be about whatever they want, but "dark" is also most often associated with horror or action movie genres. Like I said, don't take this too seriously, but enjoy watching "dark" movies, nevertheless:)
