main conduit, which main conduit is charged with the gas and connects a source to the recipient. The invention will be described herewith with reference to a process and a device in which a main conduit connects a source to a recipient through which the gas is guided. However, the invention is not to be understood as limited to such devices, but also as intended for the control of gas in devices different from such a conduit. It is known to measure the current of a current-controlled means for the adjustment of the size of the cross section of the main conduit of a gas-metering device, so as to control the gas-metering device according to the gas requirements of the recipient. Such a measurement is important, among other things, if the main conduit is disposed within a building to prevent dust and damp from penetrating into the building, since the gas-metering device and the main conduit serve to protect the building from such dust and damp. If the current is too high, the main conduit will be clogged and the metering of the gas will not take place correctly. If the current is too low, the current-controlled means may be damaged, or it may be disconnected from the gas-metering device. A large part of the metering devices of the above-
