systematic review of research articles. Chest pain is a frequent presenting complaint in the emergency department (ED). Delayed diagnosis of acute coronary syndromes (ACS) results in significantly higher morbidity and mortality. Several scoring systems have been developed to help clinicians to distinguish between patients with a benign condition and those who are suffering from ACS. The objective of this study was to systematically review the literature on the diagnostic value of scoring systems for patients with chest pain in the ED and to summarize the inter-rater reliability and construct validity of such systems. The preferred reporting items for systematic reviews and meta-analyses (PRISMA) statement was followed. A structured search of PubMed, EMBASE, and The Cochrane Library was performed for research articles describing ACS-specific scoring systems used in the ED. Inclusion criteria were articles describing an ACS-specific scoring system in the ED setting and abstracts published in English. Two independent reviewers extracted the data on study design, sample population, the scoring system used, and their outcomes. The review was conducted between October 2005 and April 2009. A total of 3696 articles were identified. Sixty-two articles describing various scoring systems were included in this review. Most studies were methodologically deficient. Only 37 studies (60%) reported inter-rater reliability and only 20 (33%) reported construct validity. It is not clear what scoring systems clinicians would use in the ED. There is a need for the development of scoring systems with good evidence of their clinical usefulness and for further research addressing reliability and validity.Micronucleus induction in Drosophila melanogaster larvae
