After more than a decade of extensive research on the pathologic and physiologic changes of the aging heart, increased attention is now being paid to the remaining controversies. This article will review recent advances, resolve the controversies, and identify unresolved issues that will stimulate future research. Data from our laboratory are used to illustrate methodological and theoretical issues relating to analyzing the time-course of the senescent changes and their consequences on cardiac function. The sequelae of aging to the heart include changes in heart rate (decreased), cardiac output (increased), left ventricular ejection fraction (decreased), cardiac sensitivity to pharmacologic and physiologic stimulation (increased), and myocardial anisotropy (increased). Observations from our laboratory indicate that stress-induced ischemia does not lead to a higher incidence of arrhythmias with aging. However, when these events occur, an increase in the risk of ventricular arrhythmias with aging is observed. This increased susceptibility may be due to age-related changes in myocardium
