A study in rural India compared treatment at public health facilities with treatment at private facilities [pone.0033685-George1]. In that study, the lower quality of care at private facilities accounted for the lower survival rates in that study. A study from Thailand also showed that lower survival rates were associated with being treated at private facilities [pone.0033685-Sokkanee1]. The lower survival rates in this study may also have been due to differences in patient selection. We studied the association of income and out-of-pocket payments with treatment-seeking and survival at public and private providers. Income was most strongly associated with treatment-seeking at the hospital, and with survival at the hospital. We did not have data on distance to a hospital, nor did we have data on the distance to a private provider. For example, as Table 2{ref-type="table"} shows, the observed differences in survival rates between private and public providers were most pronounced at hospitals, which might explain why out-of-pocket payments at these providers were the most strongly associated with survival. However, when we fitted the same logistic regression models in separate strata of distance to a private provider, we found that the treatment
