While reservations I have about the quality of the Fujifilm X-Trans RAW conversion are based on my personal experience, I do believe Adobe will eventually nail the rendering of such raw files. There are some minor things I still encounter – Johny is kind enough to point out in the Silkypix vs. Lightroom RAW conversion section. Overall, I was impressed by the feel of Lightroom 5 and how it treated my RAW images. It loads up much quicker than Lightroom 4 and saved the last preview to a file for quick undoing. I will continue using Lightroom 5 for now. I believe that with the pending acquisition of Adobe by $3.4 billion Microsoft, the landscape of RAW digital photography is as good as it can get. The addition of Lens Blur and Advanced Sharpening controls in Lightroom 5 means that you are able to make much more fine-tuned edits to fine-tune your images in postprocessing. There is also a new, non-destructive photo filter called HDR Photo in Lightroom 5, which enhances images as a complete composite. The "Create HDR from Photos" function in Lightroom 5 enables non-destructive editing, including adjustments of exposure, brightness and contrast. With the HDR Photo filter, you can shoot several frames, then combine them all in Photoshop or other tools. You can then change the lighting or other photographic qualities, and composite them all together several times. Using the selective removal tool in Lightroom 5, you can then get rid of small areas of pixels (if you like) and create a more pleasing final image. While the HDR Photo filter is non-destructive, you may start to notice that you cannot hit the 'save' button until you have completed the photostory, rather than saving sub-files. This way you are always sure that you have all settings.
